4. The Chatwal, New York City

The Chatwal, built in the early 1900s, lives in a building that can't help but catch the eye, and it's not because it towers above you or glows with flashy lights, like others in the theatre district. The six-story neo-Georgian brick building features a façade ornamented with columns, six ram heads and two ram profiles. Bellmen in traditional getup open the doors to the past as you walk up a few steps into the Empire Art-Deco period of the 1930s. The rooms are even more impressive; the walls of every room in this hotel are suede, the closet and dressers are covered in leather, and the huge windows provide great views of the city. Paying homage to their hometown, the rooms feature NYC-themed art and sparkling bathroom floors that are a more glamorous version of New York's sidewalks that shimmer with broken glass and city grit
